Distinction between reflection & thinking according to REFLECT

Reflection involves the whole person, connecting more body and mind so to speak: thoughts, feelings, values, intuitions and experiences are taken into consideration when reflecting. It's a more holistic process whereas thinking is a more rational process, relying solely on logical reasoning (e.g. problem solving by straightforward, objective cause-and-effect-reasoning). Therefore, reflection is usually indicated by some kind of emotional intensity in which learners demonstrate the connection between themselves and that-which-is-at-stake (the actual topic of reflection). This intensity can sometimes be expressed only in their non-verbal body language. As thinking involves more logic and rationality, this emotional intensity is usually missing.

Taking care of some essential learning conditions for the reflective atmosphere to grow

- Raising awareness within learners to ‘own’ their learning in personally meaningful way (it is not about taking over the expertise of the educator!)
- Developing a relationship between educators and learners based on trust, openness, empathy, transparency, dialogue and feedback
- Co-creating the reflective process
- Managing to keep up the steering paradox of intrinsic learning processes
- Directing the reflective attention of learners
- Slowing down and valuing moments of not-knowing
